Holst & Co., a member of the Norwest Holst Group, has introduced flexible working hours for all its staff at its head office. It claims to be the first UK construction company to do this. The three-month trial period is being conducted with the approval of the majority of the staff which includes the design and drawing offices. All 150 employees must be at their job during the 'core time' from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. They may choose arrival and departure time from 8 a.m. to 10 a.m. and 4 p.m. to 6 p.m. 150 hours have to be put in over each four-week period. Hengster Flexitime recording equipment is being used for the trial. The managing director of Holst commented, "This is an exercise on responsibility. We regard our staff as very responsible people and it is only on this basis that the flexible working system can succeed." He emphasized that if after the trial, a majority of staff was not satisfied, it would not be continued. On the other hand, if it proved successful, the company would consider extending Flexitime to its other offices throughout the country.

Crash! Dot.com

Boo.com was a United Kingdom Internet company founded by Ernst Malmsten. Boo.com was one of Europe's biggest dot.com disasters, and looking back, it is not hard to see why it all went so wrong. In May 1999, the company attracted about $120 million from investors and seemed to be one of the brightest stars of the 'new economy'. The founders spent $25 million on advertising, which meant that they ran out of funds very quickly. They took on hundreds of employees, leaving the company with a huge wage bill every month. They had no competent financial director and wasted million more on jetting around the world, staying at expensive hotels and giving large parties. The boo.com website was widely criticized as poorly designed for its target customers. The website itself was too heavy and this made it much too slow. They sold very few clothes because their prices were too much high. In May 2000, with a weekly turnover of $500,000 and weekly expenses of $1,500,000, and no more money in the bank, it was clear that the game was up and the company went broke. It has become a famous story of poor management over the years.

On the Internet since 1994, the Swedish newspaper Aftonbladet claims to have been Europe's first major internet newspaper. What's more, in an area characterized by financial losses, it has made a profit for the last four years. But this year, things may be different. Despite huge viewing figures, Aftonbladet's internet operations will make a loss as advertising income, which accounts for 85% of its revenue, slows sharply.

Now, along with other newspaper sites, Aftonbladet is looking at how to charge for its services without losing readers who have come to regard free access as a right. "The present business model is not just efficient, especially when advertising is falling," explains Kalle Jungkvist, editor-in-chief of Aftonbladet New Media. Sweden is among the most advanced internet markets in the world with internet penetration rates of about 58%. This is the highest in the EU, according to Net Figures, the UK statistics group.

Yet, high numbers of viewers have not been enough for advertisers who are doubtful about online marketing – dot.com adverts have almost disappeared. Charging provides a much-needed source of revenue. But how to persuade people to pay for something that until now has been free?

1. What is Aftonbladet?

2. Why is Aftonbladet making a loss this year?

3. What is Aftonbladet doing to make up for the loss?

Advertisers have to be very careful about the way they position their products. In 1977, cigarette makers in the US were forced to stop advertisements featuring a cartoon camel. The government said that the company had positioned the cigarette to appeal to children, which was against the law.

The French have a marketing strategy that sums up positioning: Cherchez le creneau (Look for the hole). To find a hole, you have to be able to think in reverse. If everyone is going east, see if you can find the hole by going west. One of the best examples of this kind of thinking was the positioning of the Volkswagen Beetle. For years, American car makers made longer, lower cars. Then came the Volkswagen Beetle. It was short, fat and ugly. Normally, advertisers would have tried to minimize its weaknesses and maximize its strengths. But Volkswagen's advertising agency decided that its 'hole' was size. It created ads that simply said, 'Think small'. With two simple words, this headline did two things at once. It stated Volkswagen's position and challenged the idea that bigger was better. There were other small cars on the market before Volkswagen. However, Volkswagen was the first car that said, 'I'm better because I'm small.'
